Appreciation

Thank you to those kind people who told me they liked my article last week on Yayoi Kusama. Feedback and appreciation can be the cornerstones for advancement in our lives. They can influence the direction we choose to follow. They can sustain us and encourage further endeavour.

Father Peter spoke last week about poverty. He spoke of poverty in our relationships being a blight in this so called 'connected world'. Connected but disconnected? Perhaps if there is a lack of appreciation for those in our lives, this is another sign of that poverty? Do we give those around us the feedback about the difference they make in our lives?

Are we lavish in our praise for the many good things people do around us every day? The doctors, the nurses, the teachers, the police officers and the like. All of those people that are ready and willing to help us and others in our time of need. Most of these people neither ask for nor expect our expressions of thanks, but I believe that we can sustain them with heartfelt and honest expressions of appreciation. Sometimes people are quick to criticize those in our 'people service' occupations and these criticisms can get them down. Particularly when they are working in very trying circumstances.

So as we travel towards the season of Advent, there is no better time to show someone near you that you care and truly appreciate the difference they make in your life.
